HE history of the first Paris press has exercised the skill of many bibliographers during the last two hundred years. The first who dealt systematically with the subject was Andre Chevillier, librarian of the College of the Sorbonne. He had at his disposal the copies, preserved in the house as relics, of the first impressions executed there: he also had access to the archives of the Congregation. It was not then possible to compare other copies of the same books scattered in numerous libraries and to note their variations; and he took it for granted that the Sorbonne possessed copies of all the books issued from its early press. For more than a century after the publication of his work, Chevillier was followed by everyone. The Rev. William Parr Greswell¹ made a concise and judicious compilation from him and Panzer, drawing the attention of English readers to early French typography, a subject of particular curiosity, as he styles it. Since then, other books from the same press have been discovered. Dibdin, Brunet, and Auguste Bernard noticed some of them, Madden and Philippe increased the list. Starting from these results we have studied the matter afresh. We have compared the copies, and read attentively all the prefaces, which give particulars hitherto unknown or imperfectly understood; and pursuing our inquiry we have examined manuscript documents which had not received serious attention. From these sources of information, combined with known historical facts,...
